Industry Recognition

Employment in business is not a licensed industry such as nursing or law. Therefore, the critical consideration, is the perception by industry and the willingness to employ and promote graduates.

The proof is in the outcomes. Graduates from UWTSD and Ducere, work across the globe, in start-ups, governments, NGOs and thw world's most recognised corporations including:

It is increasingly apparent, that industry values practical skills over academic transcripts. Historically employers may have recruited based on the school a student attended. However universities are under increasing pressure, to demonstrate value far beyond the credential.

“ We’ve looked at the mismatch between the skills that are coming out of colleges and what the skills are that we believe we need in the future.
Tim Cook, CEO, Apple

Relevant to employers are whether candidates are:

- » Job ready
- » Motivated to work productively and ethically
- » Able to work both in co-operative teams, and autonomously
- » Digitally and financially literate
- » Open to continuous learning
- » Problem solving and accountability mindset

“ The first – and most important – disconnect is between the characteristics of higher education institutions and the skill needs of employers.
The World Bank, ‘Putting higher education to work’
